Foreword...

Early ACCESS and Iowa SCRIPT (Supporting Change and Reform in Interprofessional Preservice Training) offer information and resources to families and faculty willing to collaborate in preservice personnel preparation programs. These programs prepare future providers of early intervention services.

Early ACCESS is a system of partnering families and professionals who provide support, resources and early intervention services to families with infants and toddlers with special needs. It is Early ACCESS and Iowa SCRIPT’s goal that all professionals will understand and use family centered practices in all aspects of their work with families.

Iowa SCRIPT is a project designed to develop, test, and evaluate an innovative model for facilitating preservice improvements. One of the project’s goals is to help sponsor the “Parents as Presenters” workshops to provide training to families of children with disabilities who are interested in sharing their experiences with college classes and other audiences. Iowa SCRIPT has helped sponsor two workshops in the past two years and is continuing to provide support for future workshops.

Early ACCESS and Iowa SCRIPT believe that partnerships between families and providers are vital for a quality, family-centered system of support. Research and our experience have shown the value of families participating in all activities of our early intervention system. When families and providers work together for a common goal and build upon each other’s strengths, the providers are more likely to use helping behaviors that are empowering to families. When these partnerships are modeled in pre-service training, students learn how to use family centered practices before they begin their teaching careers.

This manual provides a guide for these family members as resources for personnel preparation programs.
Acknowledgments...

This project came from a planning process initiated by the Iowa SCRIPT (Supporting Changes and Reform in Interprofessional Preservice Training in Iowa) team. It could not have been successful without the extensive collaboration efforts that went into planning and conducting the family training event. This involved a cadre of parents and representatives from higher education, the Parent Training Information Center of Iowa, Family Voices of Iowa, Early ACCESS, the Parent Educator Connection, and the Iowa Department of Education.

We would also like to thank the Missouri FEEL project for providing the training curriculum.

“There is no doubt that I am a better teacher
having co-instructed with a parent…

Co-instruction heightened my awareness and sensitivity to the language that I used, the attitude that I portrayed, the generalizations that weren’t appropriate. She [parent] kept me honest!”

Dr. Susan McBride,

Quotes from different perspectives....

A Student

Through the stories parents shared about their lives, I have learned a great deal more than by reading a book. It put a face and emotions on the “families” we are always talking about in our activities. It has helped me see what kind of lives parents may be living when all I otherwise would have thought about was the child. Getting to actually hear from parents helps me to better understand the purpose of being family-centered and how important it is.

A Faculty Member

The presence and contributions of parents of children with disabilities in my class is invaluable. There is nothing that I can say that can have the same impact as parents sharing their stories and personal lives with students. These stories are what make the difference in students learning what family-centered really means.
Introduction

Why a manual?

This manual is intended to help college and university faculty and others throughout Iowa support family members of children with disabilities who are willing to share their stories. Families can be influential in shaping college students’ attitudes and practices when family participation is integrated throughout college courses and experiences. When students learn the principles and practices of family-centered services in meaningful ways, they are better prepared to develop empowering relationships with families in their chosen profession.

Higher Education faculties throughout Iowa have already enhanced their curricula by inviting parents to present their perspectives to students. These faculty enthusiastically confirm the value of practice, and student feedback on course evaluations routinely provide additional support.

How do you use this manual?

We have provided some suggestions and tips when inviting family members to speak to your students or to key stakeholders. We share information on how to find family members, a continuum of roles family members can take, clarification of roles, compensation, and a list of resources. Starting on page 18, there is a listing of family members with a short description of each child’s special needs, family scheduling preferences and topics of interest.

We hope this information will be useful to you. Please select a family member and contact him or her to discuss your training needs.

Finding Families for Co-Presenting

If you don’t find a family in your geographic area listed in the directory, here are some other ways to find families:

1) Develop a partnership with local service providers who work with young children with disabilities and their families. Ask these providers to pass along a letter inviting families to come tell their stories in your class.
2) Contact the Early ACCESS Regional Coordinator in your area by calling your Area Education Agency.
3) Contact the Parent Training and Information Center of Iowa located in Des Moines at 1-800-450-8667 or 515-243-1713 or www.iowapti.org. The Center has a directory that lists parents of children with special needs who are willing to participate in parent leadership opportunities. They also have information about parent support groups throughout the state and could facilitate communication with them.
4) Contact the Parent – Educator Connection (PEC) representative in your local Area Education Agency (AEA).
5) After getting to know a family, ask them whom they know in the community that might like to present in your class. If you have some funds you could even pay a family member to help you connect with and contact other families (See SCRIPT mini grant description, page 10).
A continuum of co-instruction roles

When inviting a family member to participate in your class, it is a good idea to first agree on how and to what extent the family member will participate in the course. At one end of the continuum, parents may only visit the class once as part of a panel, whereas at the other end of the continuum, a parent comes to every class as a co-instructor. The instructor will need to know the parent’s strengths and experiences to help determine the extent of the parent role (McBride, Sharp, Hains & Whitehead, 1989).

Some faculty invite several family members as guest speakers to be part of a panel. The families share their stories, and there could be a specific topic to address that corresponds with class curriculum. The family member usually gives information in the form of a family story. This can be done in a conversational manner, in response to specific questions or as a prepared presentation. To encourage creativity, we ask families to bring pictures or props. It is also good to set aside time at the end to let students ask questions. We have found that it works best if the students have some prepared questions for the panel in order to start the dialogue. In larger classes you may want students to write down questions during the presentation/panel and the instructor can then sort and review before giving them to guest speakers.

On the other end of the continuum, a parent participates as a co-instructor the entire semester. The parent co-instructor role varies depending on their comfort level and experience. At first the parent might only share the family perspective as the faculty member teaches content. As the parent-faculty relationship grows parent co-instructors might want to take on more responsibilities (e.g., teach course content, grade tests and papers, and contacting other family members to be involved with the course).

Over time as the partnership matures and changes, these decisions are jointly made with the parent and faculty member. This is a wonderful demonstration of the mutual learning that can occur between parent and professional.

Other preservice roles

Family members can also be involved with students without ever entering a classroom setting. A student can be matched up with an individual family for a number of visits that may include an information gathering conversation as well as an avenue for starting to begin learning how to listen to families. There are some preservice programs that assign a student to a family for an entire semester. The student has time to really understand the family and to reciprocate to the family in some way (e.g. provide childcare, assist with tutoring, cook a meal for the family). A family might not have the time to participate in any of these roles but can be a valuable resource in helping you connecting with other families.

Family members have a wide variety of experiences. Some may be experienced public speakers, while others may be relatively new at presenting to a group. Here are some tips for inviting families:

Initial Invitation Call

- At least two weeks prior to the date invite the family member to speak to the class;
- Describe the class or inservice, the topic, and the objectives you would like the family member to address:
  - What is the main purpose of the class or session?
  - What do you hope the students will gain?
Which family centered practices are you hoping to illustrate?

What questions might the students ask the family member?

- Discuss how much time the family has to share their information/story;
- Discuss how the family and instructor will work together if things become uncomfortable or too emotional. Is this family okay with the emotions that may develop or is there something the instructor can do or say if that happens?
- Ask the family member if audiovisual equipment and/or assistance with handouts are needed;
- Discuss compensation or honorarium, how much, and when to expect payment.

Follow-Up

- Send a follow-up note to confirm the date, time, location, and parking availability; You can send a map and/or parking permit at this time if necessary;
- Consider ways in which to make the family member comfortable;
- Prepare the participants for the family member’s presentation. Ask participants to think of some questions beforehand;
- Offer to arrange for a participant to meet the family member at a specific location to help guide them to the meeting room or carry materials;
- Call a day or two before the date to ask if there are any last minute questions, discuss the presentation, and finalize details.

Day of Presentation

- Provide an introduction that acknowledges the family member’s expertise.
- Remind the family that she/he does not need to answer sensitive questions.
- Offer to facilitate discussion.

- Have water or a beverage available for the guest speaker
- Consider giving a small token of thanks (pen, note pad, flowers, in addition to honorarium).

After Presentation

- Send a brief thank-you note with positive comments from the participants or encourage students to directly send thank you notes (students could get extra credit points).
- Follow up with information on the honorarium.

Talking about and offering compensation

Offering supports to families when they participate in preservice training demonstrates respect for their contributions. It also models reciprocity in the relationship, a vital ingredient in effective partnerships.

Conversations about compensation: After it is clear what the family will be doing to meet the needs of the class, it is time to have a conversation about compensating the family for their time and effort. This is so families can in turn receive resources that meet their individual needs (e.g., childcare, mileage). Compensation does not have to only be monetary. Ask the families what they need or offer an array of resources. Really, anything can be negotiated until everyone feels good.

Offering resources: Early ACCESS encourages colleges and universities to find ways to offer creative resources to families in exchange for their participation. Right now Early ACCESS has some funds available for a small honorarium (see page —— for details) for a one time visit to a class. However, there are not enough funds to support a full semester of co-instruction, so as faculty you will need to obtain resources through the college system. Personnel Preparation grants can be written that specifically support family/faculty co-instruction. Family members can be hired as adjunct faculty or donations from local community/civic groups can be obtained.

Other resources families may like includes:

- Respite care by students;
- Tickets to college/university or community events (e.g., sports, concerts);
- Passes to college or university recreation centers, gyms;
- Financial reimbursement;
- College course credit (in-kind);
- Community education opportunities (i.e., computer classes, art classes).

BE CREATIVE!

Funding Sources

Early ACCESS and Iowa SCRIPT Honorarium

Early ACCESS and Iowa SCRIPT have committed a sum of money within their budgets to assist faculty who invite families to present in their classrooms. The monies are intended to reimburse families for their participation in illustrating the Early ACCESS guiding principles of family centered services and practices. The honorarium for a classroom presentation is $35 dollars. See Forms section for payment instructions.

The above is just one of the funding resources that faculty can offer to families. Early ACCESS and Iowa SCRIPT are pleased to offer this resource at this time, but realize that a long-term approach to compensating families is needed. Higher education institutions will need to make efforts toward developing structures within their own system or community that offer a range of options to families for continuing support.

I have been so impacted by the personal stories of the families that I will never look at working with a child in the same way. I no longer have such a narrow perspective that focuses only on the child. That child is now a part of something larger, involving the whole family and so many other people. I hope that I will continue to grow in my understanding of the concept of supporting the whole family.

From the Parents...

I had no idea that what I had to say was so new for these students. I wanted them to know what it has been like for our family to get services so they can make a difference for other families. They asked wonderful questions that helped me to understand that I was really making a difference in their learning.
